

This morning in sleep paralysis I hallucinated a home invasion, felt the weight of a stranger's body, woke sucking down air.

I'm home and the radiator doesn't tick all night like pebbles at the window but I still don't know what to do. In this state of collapse I'll see what floats to the top, whether it's cream or specter. Even at the end of the end times there's an apocalypse ahead and further off still are all the things coming unmoored in me. I imagine angels are losing their minds so I can't say I'll keep keeping the lights on.

I flip a coin for this entire year and the sun doesn't care if I haunt every corner of every room, cordless. Am I really living if I've never lain on the floor in the dark asking God what shadows are shadows and what shadows are ghosts? This is the hollowed out feeling that only Texas can fill and I try to be still so that I can be whole, if bitten by the wind. This year has been so long and when I unpack my suitcase I throw out the ticket and the sick bag that served as bookmarks. I put away my winter hat and my medicine. I'll carry these days knotted in my shoulders because it turns out there is no dark side of the moon and if you tell me what to do one more time I'll strike a match and run. Tonight I look to myself with prayers and the sun sets on all our oceans, even when we are hiding from the dark, all these miles from the Atlantic. It must be drawing near—a home where I can choose a garden or a grave for my own rest. Where what the wind and water take is just as much a song as the last breath in me that hasn't learned despair. Where the cloying scent of salt is something to store in my cupboard with lonely spiders. And I'll close the cupboard door, my body a long shadow as I dim the kitchen lights.
